Episode 57 – Lila Allen – Metropolis

A Star is Born

And now a personal word,

Lila Allen and I recorded our conversation in a conference room in the offices of Metropolis Magazine on the 17th floor of 205 Lexington Avenue in Manhattan, across from the New York Design Center and blocks away from the Chrysler Building. I had walked crosstown from my hotel on 10th Avenue and 42nd Street. Along the way I had taken in the city. Broadway between 42nd and 34th Street. Herald Square. The Empire State Building. Fifth Avenue then Park Avenue then Madison Avenue until I arrived at Lexington. Lila greeted me when I arrived in her office. Pages from the next issue of Metropolis Magazine were pinned on bulletin boards. Writers and editors were huddled around work stations. Covers from past issues of the magazine were neatly framed. How cool, I thought.

I first met Lila in Charlotte in 2009, a few months after she had graduated from Davidson College. She was 22 years old. I was 46 years old. I was publisher of Charlotte Viewpoint, a web-based magazine about metropolitan ideas and art. We published interviews, articles, poems, op-eds, photographs and reviews about the civic and cultural life of the Charlotte region. Lila submitted a work of first-person fiction called In the Crosshairs. The work was smart and literary and compelling to read. And that's exactly how Lila came across in person: smart, literary, compelling and far more savvy about art theory and pop culture than I ever could be. Her next piece was one I had requested about Lady Gaga. She entitled it 'Fame Monsters: Why We're Goo-Goo for Gaga Puffs.' That was in February 2010. That month she accepted my request to become editor-in-chief of Charlotte Viewpoint magazine.

Charlotte Viewpoint reached its creative peak under her leadership. Lila led a team of talented and dedicated editors, writers and designers, including Jeff Jackson, Michael Solender, Alex Gregor, Elise Anderson, Casey Brewton, Carolie Bartol and Chris Cureton. She edited the work of accomplished free-lance writers, including Philip Larrimore and Amanda Pagliarini. She wrote her own column every month. She helped produce type/face, a live magazine on stage at the Visulite Theatre, in collaboration with Charlotte magazine, and helped market Topograph: New Writing from the Carolinas & the Landscape Beyond, a literary anthology, edited by Jeff Jackson, published by Novello Press. Lila also helped lead a complete re-branding of Charlotte Viewpoint and the launch of an entirely new website platform. She worked closely with me as publisher and executive director of the underlying non-profit organization. She got all of this work done at night and on weekends, while working full-time during the day at the Bechtler Museum of Modern Art.

Our vision at Charlotte Viewpoint was to represent the best of what metropolitan ideas and art could be. Lila embodied our ideals.

In June 2011, after 15 months of serving as editor-in-chief, Lila asked if we could meet for coffee. She gave notice that she was moving on. Within a year, Lila moved to New York. I remember receiving a call from The Metropolitan Museum of Art asking about Lila. I told them they couldn't hire a better person. The woman on the phone said that Lila had made such a good first impression they had decided to hire Lila on the spot, but they just hadn't told Lila yet to not come across as too eager to invite her on-board.

I had all those memories in mind when I met Lila at Metropolis Magazine. Her work is defining design and architecture across the world. Her life and career are a perfect progression of metropolitan ideas and art.

How cool is that?
